What's In: Curved Forms Are Here to Stay

"The resurgence of curves and rounded forms in architecture and cabinetry is exciting to see and will be here to stay for some time. Incorporating curved forms throughout the home is a great way to organically soften sharp angles and curate an inviting, warm feel. In 2025, we can expect to see more rounded forms executed in kitchen design as the industry continues to play with shapes, proportions, and other elements in a modern way."

What's Essential: Warmth and Texture

"We are continuing to see a pivot back to warmer materials and textures. Rich wood tones, brassy metals, hand-troweled plasters, and plush velvets are just a few of the hues and materials we're currently excited about. The Monogram Designer Collection leans into this with bold finishes in titanium and brass that transcend style to make an impactful design statement."

What's Next: Bold Details Will Be Everywhere in 2025

"Customization and combining unique materials is key to creating tailor-made designs, but today's homeowners want to go bolder. Exotic stone patterns, mixed media, and unorthodox color combinations will be all the rage in 2025. We'll see these striking visuals and pops of personality really take shape in the kitchen as people continue to spend more time cooking, hosting, and gathering in the heart of the home."

The Future of Luxury is Tailor-Made Styles with Unique Applications

“The modern homeowner is seeking pieces that tell a story and inspire them to elevate their homes, from cooking appliances to furnishings and everything in between. The future of luxury design will tap into new facets of customization to reimagine elegance and craftsmanship. We’ll see hints of historic architecture and upscale jewelry, clothing, vehicles, and other cultural cornerstones layered into products. We’ll also see how the unique applications of materials, such as the sustainably sourced, durable leather hardware within Monogram Designer Collection columns, can offer a new way to execute thoughtful design with expressiveness and originality.”
